MILLIONS of moustaches have been sprouting this month in the annual Movember campaign, which raises funds and awareness for men's health.

From handlebars to pencils, it's usually the male of the species who boast this type of facial decoration. But why leave it to the lads?

Leicester make-up artist and keen bodypainter Jessica Nurse painted a moustache on her face as "a bit of a giggle" at the start of November, but the resulting photo proved so popular among her social media friends that she decided to do it every day for the whole month.

Inspired by famous moustaches – including those sported by Hulk Hogan, Charlie Chaplin and Super Mario – Jessica has spent about half an hour each morning painting the design on to her face, then taking a photo and uploading it on to Twitter – to much delight from followers.

To begin with, Jessica removed the face paint before leaving her home, but for the past week, she has braved the outside world with her mos in place, in a bid to encourage more donations for Movember.

She said: "I've really enjoyed doing the tashes, but I'll be happy to not have to get up so early every day."
